

LIDICE: Village of Death

THIS IS THE SCENE of the Nazis' latest triumph. Lidice was a quiet little Czechoslovak village like thousands in the U. S. Its people, miners and farmers, worshipped at the ancient church and shopped in the little general store (left).

Today Lidice is no more. The church and the houses are leveled with the ground. Every man over 17 was murdered. Every woman was deported, and Lidice's children are imprisoned in German reform schools. Even the cattle and the pigs were driven away.

The raising of Lidice was part of the campaign of terror that the Nazis began after the assassination of their bloody policeman Reinhardt Heydrich. Having executed hundreds of men and women, the Gestapo turned its anger on this innocent village and laid it waste. Unaccounted for in their attempts to stop the resistance of the people of occupied countries, the whole nation of Lidice was the Nazis' first step in the new and final technique in Jewry—slaughter and flight as well as Czechoslovakia.
